In this activity, I approached the webpage by “thinking in boxes,” meaning I looked at the page as a collection of large sections instead of one complicated design. I started by identifying the major blocks of the layout, such as the header at the top, the sidebar navigation, the main content area, and the footer. Seeing these big sections first made the page feel less overwhelming and easier to understand. Instead of focusing on colors or details right away, I focused on how the page is structured and how each section is positioned relative to the others.

After identifying the major sections, I broke each one down into smaller elements. For example, inside the header, I noted the logo, search bar, and user icons, while the main content area contained grids, cards, or thumbnails. I then sketched these blocks and labeled them to visualize how the layout is layered. This process helped me plan how I would structure the HTML and CSS before writing any code. Overall, thinking in boxes made it easier to organize the layout, reduce mistakes, and work more efficiently when building webpages in the future.
